and the other was used to test the hypothesis that there may be some "peak" level of arousal by which the organism must be motivated. The organism must be motivated to a certain level in order to begin the behavior. This is called "threshold motivation." This is what Hanger is alluding to. The threshold level is raised in the Pigeon Internal-External Control paradigm by changing the way stimuli are presented, which allows stimuli to become stronger. Thus, a pigeon will respond to a stimulus only if the stimulus is strong enough to reach the threshold. We can use a similar model to understand human behavior. There are "threshold" levels of arousal and motivation that must be reached in order to begin thinking.

1. The first step in the process of creating a new product is to identify a market need. This involves conducting market research to determine what consumers want and what problems they are trying to solve. Once a need is identified, the next step is to develop a concept for a product that addresses that need. This concept should be based on the market research and should be feasible, desirable, and profitable. The third step is to create a prototype of the product. This can be done using a variety of methods, including 3D printing, computer-aided design (CAD), and traditional manufacturing techniques. The prototype is used to test the product's design and functionality, and to gather feedback from potential customers. The fourth step is to conduct a feasibility study. This involves evaluating the product's potential for success in the market, taking into account factors such as production costs, distribution channels, and competition. Finally, the fifth step is to develop a business plan for the product. This plan should outline the product's marketing strategy, financial projections, and overall business model. Once the business plan is complete, the product can be launched into the market.
